The Deutsche Gesellschaft für Internationale Zusammenarbeit (GIZ) GmbH has been working in Tunisia since 1970. It has had an office in the capital, Tunis, since 1999.

Tunisia faces considerable social and economic challenges. The unemployment rate is high, important governmental structural reforms have yet to be implemented, and regional inequalities are weakening trust in the state and undermining social cohesion. In addition, climate change is threatening agriculture, food security and the incomes of many people, in particular due to increasing water scarcity.

The energy sector is also under strain. More than half the country's energy needs are currently being met through imports. The expansion of renewable energy is progressing slowly, while subsidised energy prices, growing demand and outdated infrastructure are exacerbating social inequalities.

GIZ is working in Tunisia on behalf of the German Government and the European Union (EU). Together with its Tunisian partners, it is implementing around 40 projects at local level and supporting the country in its economic and social development. It focuses on
